Managing with Insight: A common mistake that most of us make is that we manage people as we would like to be managed, as opposed to how they would like to be managed.

Understanding the temperament of your people means understanding what motivates them, how they learn and how they behave in a team environment. Knowing these things, you are more able to keep them stimulated, satisfied and achieving their maximum potential.

Build Cohesive Teams: Understanding the temperaments of your team members helps you to build a balanced, compatible team—and to defuse conflicts among team members.
